For the owner of an early hot rod, chopping the top is the first, and most important, body modification that they will perform. You only have to look at the Model As, Deuce Coupes or Chevy two-doors at any hot rod event to realize that nearly all the coupes, sedans, and even convertibles, are wearing their top two to four inches lower than they did when stock. Chopping a top is not only the most important and common body modification made by many rodders, it's also the one major body modification that can literally make or break the car. Do it right, and the end result is a car with a solid structure that looks just right. Do it wrong, and the result is often a car that never gets finished, or one that simply looks wrong. Author John Zechbauer, a second generation hot rod builder, learned the craft as a teenage from his father Carl - a craftsman who chopped over 400 tops during his life. The book includes step by step sequences of over 20 top chops, all done by either John and/or his father.
