A Girl Made of Dust is a coming of age story set in the hills above Beirut. The location is very nicely evoked, and the encroaching war (though it is always present in the background) does not overpower the plot. The feeling of a young child observing the world is mostly very well done, and the story is strong enough to draw you in.

Review: "A Girl Made of Dust" by Nathalie Abi-Ezzi - Words ...

A Girl Made of Dust is set in Lebanon in 1982 during the Israeli Invasion. I enjoyed this coming of age story because of its simultaneously naive and wise protagonist, Ruba, and because I know so little of this country and the invasion.

Some of the imagery would be shown in a very direct fashion, like our girl made of dust – who was a girl “covered in sand and dirt”. Or sometimes she’s more subtle about it, weaving together events with words that create an image in our mind.

A Girl Made of Dust is a semi-autobiographical novel by Nathalie Abi-Ezzi who, like some of the characters in her story, moved to the safety of England in 1983 when Israel invaded Lebanon. She has written the novel from the perspective of an eight-year-old, but overcame my resistance to child narrators with a vivid story.
