Brenda Ashford was a British nanny, trained by the (apparently) exclusive Norland Institute, who served as a nanny for over 62 years. This is her story of her life I came across a Spoonful of Sugar accidentally, when searching for an item that would fulfill my reading challenge of a title involving the word "sugar," that would also be available from my library on audio.

In A Spoonful of Sugar, Brenda recalls her years at Norland, her experiences during the war (after all, even if bombs are dropping there's no reason to let standards slip) and recounts in lovely detail a life devoted to the care of other people's children. Sprinkled throughout with pearls of wisdom (children can never have too much love, and learn how to sew a button, for goodness' sake) this delightful memoir from Britain's oldest living nanny is practically perfect in every way.

From Booklist : For readers accustomed to nanny exposés filled with snark, gossip, and...

bad behavior, Ashford's memoir will indeed go down like a spoonful of sugar. The reference to Mary Poppins is apt, as Ashford, who trained as a nanny in the 1930s, is very much a character from another era.
