Accounts Receivable Journal Entry Example

Accounts receivable are current assets which represent amounts to be collected from customers for goods sold or services provided. When a company sells goods or provides services, the customers usually do not make a payment on the spot. Instead, they are required to make payment within a certain time period, called credit period.

When a customer pays an invoice, an account receivable collection journal entry is required to clear the amount on their account. For example, suppose a business provides services to a customer and has invoiced them 3,000 on account, due in 30 days.
