With that being said, many screenwriters have succeeded in creating compelling film adaptations of short stories that deserve recognition. 1. "Rear Window" (1954) Based on the short story titled "It Had to be Murder" by Cornell Woolrich, this cinematic classic takes Woolrich's story to a whole new level. Screenwriter John Michael Hayes did a magnificent job adapting the literary work, and though the short story is worth reading, the screen adaptation is much more entertaining.

Stephen King is one of the most-adapted authors of all time. In the nearly 50 years since "Carrie" first hit the big-screen, almost every King novel, and many of his short stories, have made it to the screen in some form, and many of the ones that haven't are already on their way. All that means that King has a pretty clear perspective on what it means to have so many other people playing in the ...
