Signals is a comprehensive developmental writing text that stresses sentence-level writing skills within the context of paragraph development. More than just a grammar text, Signals focuses on the choices that writers make to write effectively. In its tone and content Signals treats its students with respect as adults, college students, and as writers. Many of the examples are in paragraph format, with continuous discourse exercises for practice. Exercises are also designed to provide useful information to college students. For example, an exercise might give paragraphs of advice on solving math word problems easily, negotiating car prices, or helping a friend involved in an abusive relationship.

The link between justice and climate change is becoming increasingly prominent in public debates on climate policy. This clear and concise philosophical introduction to climate justice addresses the hot topic of climate change as a moral challenge. Using engaging everyday examples the authors address the core arguments by providing a comprehensive and balanced overview of this heated debate, enabling students and practitioners to think critically about the subject area and to promote discussion on questions such as: Why do anything in the face of climate change? How much do we owe our descendants – a better world, or nothing at all? How should we distribute the burden of climate action between industrialized and developing countries? Should I adopt a green lifestyle even if no one else makes an effort? Which means of reducing emissions are permissible? Should we put hope in technological solutions? Should we re-design democratic institutions for more effective climate policy? With chapter summaries, illustrative examples and suggestions for further reading, this book is an ideal introduction for students in political philosophy, applied ethics and environmental ethics, as well as for practitioners working on one of the most urgent issues of our time.
