'Archangel' is quite friendly towards those not familiar with the legacy of Josef Stalin, and is an engrossing mystery as a result.

Unfortunately, there's also a lack of character development here.

The people in this television film are just sort of presented to the audience, and then become pawns in the film's narrative.

Top-flight thriller, something of a variation on le Carré's The Russia House, as an American historian tracks down a MacGuffin of far greater value than the Maltese falcon. Fluke Kelso, having published two books about the fall of the Soviet empire, finds himself invited to a symposium in Moscow that will supposedly focus on newly released archival material.
