Bobolink - Wikipedia

Fluttering over meadows and hayfields in summer,
the male Bobolink delivers a bubbling, tinkling song
which, loosely interpreted, gives the species its name.
The male is unmistakable in spring finery, but before fall migration he molts into a striped brown appearance like that of the female. Bobolinks in this plumage were once known as "ricebirds" in the South, where they occasionally used to ...

Perched on a grass stem or displaying in flight over a field, breeding male Bobolinks are striking. No other North American bird has a white back and black underparts (some have described this look as wearing a tuxedo backwards). Added to this are the male 's rich, straw-colored patch on the head and his bubbling, virtuosic song. As summer ends he molts into a buff and brown female-like plumage.

The bobolink (Dolichonyx oryzivorus) is a small New World blackbird and the only member of the genus Dolichonyx. An old name for this species is the "Rice Bird", from its tendency to feed on cultivated grains. Adults are 16 – 18 cm (6.3 – 7.1 in) long with short finch-like bills and weigh about 1 oz (28 g). Adult males are mostly black with creamy napes and white scapulars, lower backs, and rumps.

Bobolink is a DLG version of the Colibri and was specially engineered for discus launch enthusiasts. Its light flying mass and composite fuselage construction makes it very rugged. The HN1033 modified thin airfoil was specially designed to allow superb high tosses, air penetration, excellent handling, and extra long glide time.

Perched on a grass stem or displaying in flight over a field, breeding male Bobolinks are striking.
