This Covid19 pandemic has blindsided us like a car crash, and it punched us in the stomach rightas we were attempting to get back up. There has to be time spent on "recovering" from thewreck, and the punches. It is imperative that we recognize our own social emotional wellbeing, so that we can make our way out of this wreckage with strength, courage, and determination.We have been, and continue to be in a crisis. In the case of the COVID-19 pandemic, the crisis"can and should be viewed through the lens of trauma" (Horesh & Brown, 2020, p. 334). Whichmeans, you, your best friend who taught down the hall from you, your colleagues, yourteachers friends have all experienced trauma. And although there are different types of trauma, we can't run from the fact that we have experienced it at some level.Even before Covid-19, we already knew that teaching can be a very stressful job. While at thesame time, we also recognize that our commitment and love for our students outweighs thestress. Therefore we keep on going, we keep on moving forward without stopping. Many times, we sacrifice ourselves for students-that is just what we do. We did it before Covid-19, and we are doing that now.

Looking closely at what happens when translanguaging is actively taken up to teach emergent bilingual students across different contexts, this book focuses on how it is already happening in classrooms as well as how it can be implemented as a pedagogical orientation. It extends theoretical understandings of the concept and highlights its promises and challenges. Using a Transformative Action Research design, six empirically grounded ethnographic case studies describe how translanguaging is used in lesson designs and in the spontaneous moves made by teachers and students during specific teaching moments. The cases shed light on two questions: How, when, and why is translanguaging taken up or resisted by students and teachers? What does its use mean for them? Although grounded in a U.S. context, and specifically in classrooms in New York State, Translanguaging with Multilingual Students links findings and theories to different global contexts to offer important lessons for educators worldwide.

This book is the first volume to be devoted to the examination of the application of the multiliteracies pedagogical framework to the teaching of Spanish to heritage language learners in higher education institutions in the United States. The Hispanic population is a growing minority, and the presence of heritage speakers can be observed in second language Spanish classes in all levels of education, which presents unique challenges for practitioners. This collection focuses on differing populations of learners in educational settings in a variety of geographical areas, such as Arizona, California, Maryland, Massachusetts, Ohio, Tennessee, and Texas. The studies included in the volume offer invaluable data and methodological insights into the instructional advantages of multiliteracies pedagogies in heritage language classrooms, and they will appeal to Spanish practitioners and researchers, as well as those interested in the education and practice of heritage languages.
