The California High School Exit Examination as Policy and Practice Cliffs Notes

This thesis represents an in-depth case study on the California High School Exit Exam (CAHSEE) in relation to students in special education, including an historical summary, exam content, basic administration guidelines, exemptions and waiver processes, and modifications and accommodations utilized on the exam. It also includes a discussion about the possible implications of the exam, including issues of fairness, student motivation, higher expectations for students in special education, and increasing the value of the California high school diploma. Because results show overall lower passing rates for students with special needs, the investigator discusses the issue of fairness and makes recommendation for increasing success on the CAHSEE for students in special education. KEYWORDS: CAHSEE, exit exams, special education, No Child Left Behind (NCLB), school accountability, California State Standards.

This EdSource report maps out the history and status of the California High School Exit Exam (CAHSEE) and addresses key issues surrounding the exam. It explains, for example, that the state superintendent has rejected postponing the exam or offering alternatives--a stance shared by many state leaders. But several lawsuits have been filed claiming that at least some seniors are at a disadvantage. One suit has resulted in an exemption for a select group of students with disabilities. The report helps shed light on the issues by describing: (1) the CAHSEE's impact to date on students as well as on the state education system; (2) issues of fairness surrounding the exam; (3) what the state is doing to help struggling students (particularly special education students); and (4) options for students who have not passed by graduation day.
