Nuclear Age and the Cold War - Oxford Scholarship

During the first ten years after the Second World War, events in the Balkans contributed significantly to the shaping of the Cold War world. The outbreak of fratricidal bloodshed in Greece in December 1944, which later escalated into a full-scale civil war, became the first major conflict of the Cold War. In May 1945, even before the German capitulation, an ideologically induced confrontation over control of Trieste threatened to draw the Communist Yugoslav People's Army and the British ...

This chapter examines how segregationists also attempted to manipulate Cold War tensions to their own political advantage. It discusses that the parochial self-interest of segregationists seemed to their political opponents “un-American,” since it destabilized the United States at a time when the country was already faced with unprecedented foreign threat.

Summary. The strategic stalemate that prevented a direct military conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union displaced violent superpower competition to areas of the Third World where the two blocs could invest in local and regional wars without risking direct confrontation. The Soviet Union tended to approach such conflicts cautiously even when they involved other Communist states.
