The Denon AVR-4802 is specified to handle speakers with an impedance load from 6 to 16 Ohms. This model also includes a high-speed protection circuit. The sole purpose of this circuit is protection of the speakers from the possibilities of power amplifier short circuit, or when the unit is played for a long time at high volume levels when the speakers have impedance lower than the spec recommended load.

Denon quotes it as 7 x 125watts, full audio band, into 8 ohms, but does not on paper suggest with how many channels driven (I'd say two). THX has been walking a fine line with me. While their design manual is, as far as I'm concerned, the bible of home theater audio, more and more we're finding areas that they "let slide".
