Elmore Leonard's Glitz is a killer...in the best possible way. "The King Daddy of crime writers" (Seattle Times) electrifies with this unputdownable noir tale of a mama's boy psycho killer with a vendetta against a Miami cop. Any Elmore Leonard novel has individual pages or short sections that are as good as anything he has ever written. But when they are separated by long stretches that just don't work, as in Djibouti, the thumb has to turn down. The 44th novel by Elmore Leonard (and the next to last he'd publish in his lifetime), Djibouti is like a zoo balloon that's quickly inflated to impressive size, prematurely released from the helium tank and let loose to fly around the gorilla habitat before deflating. Get the kid another balloon, this one's broke.

Djibouti, By Elmore Leonard | The Independent

I love Elmore Leonard. When people ask me my favourite author, more often than not, his name is the one I find leaping to the tip of my tongue. So it pains me to write this, almost as much as it pained me to read Djibouti. And it did pain me, immensely.
