"It follows that the future task of semiology is far less to establish lexicons of objects than to rediscover the articulations which men impose on reality; looking into the distant and perhaps ideal future, we might say that semiology and taxonomy, although they are not yet born, are perhaps meant to be merged into a new science, arthrology, namely, the science of apportionment."

This little book, The Elements of Semiology, stays true to its title. It is not an exhaustive summary of an established science of signs, but rather an analytically sharp series of pithy explorations of concepts (mostly oppositional), which Barthes thought essential to the development of semiology as a science, namely: language/speech; signifier/signified; syntagm/system; and connotation/metalanguage.
