George Washington was an exceptional leader. He was the ideal man to head the American Continental Army and later to become the United States' first president, its “founding CEO.” Washington became a leader early in life. At 21, he was commissioned in the colonial militia.

Most of all, he did not allow himself to be swept up in the war hysteria of Anglophile and Francophile. Unlike Woodrow Wilson, George Washington actually did keep us out of war, at considerable cost to his short-term popularity, if not to his historical reputation. But of course, he supplied positive leadership as well.
