The Dahl of Going Solo is a curious Peter Pan-like figure experiencing adult adventures without growing up properly. Apart from a hint of romance when he is in hospital in Alexandria after a plane crash, there is no hint of sex in the book, which is just how we liked it. Dahl's great gift was that he related to children better than to adults.

Going Solo finds Dahl travelling the dirt roads of Tanganyika in an old station wagon visiting distant and often eccentric Shell customers, the people who quite literally kept the machinery of Empire running. It was a headily independent life and full of incident – the wife of a District Officer's cook was carried off by a lion but survived unharmed and the Shell garden boy was very nearly dispatched by a lethal black mamba.
