In the 80's Jay McInerney and Brett Easton Ellis were being touted as the Hemingway and Fitzgerald of a new generation. I don't know if anybody had in mind which was supposed to be Hemingway and which Fitzgerald, but in, How It Ended, McInerney's book of new and collected short stories, I think McInerney makes a bid for Fitzgerald's mantle.

For a quarter-century now, Jay McInerney has been telling fundamentally the same story: Innocent newcomer to the neon jungle gains the world -- or at least a book contract, a bespoke suit and a gorgeous girlfriend -- only to lose his soul. "How It Ended" presents a dozen amusing but ultimately self-indulgent variations on that theme.

The stories collected in "How It Ended" by Jay McInerney span almost thirty years. They are assembled in no particular order and include McInerney's first published story as well as a number that he produced rapid fire in 2008. What struck me most about these stories is that I could never guess in what year each was written.
