Write a strong beginning. The key to a good horror story is a strong beginning. Your beginning should hint at the story's central problem and introduce one or two characters that will deal with that problem. There are many ways to start a scary story. Some writers might start in the middle of the story and move back, opening with a scene ...

The First Chapter of Your Book
Chances are that your 4-year-old already knows the alphabet. If that's not the case, use a rhyme or the "Alphabet Song" to help him remember the letters. Make an alphabet strip out of cardboard and markers, writing each letter in a bold color to ensure that your little one has mastery of letter recognition. Point to each letter and say the name.
