Excerpt from Lawn Tennis: Its Past, Present, and Future There is none too much literature on the game of lawn tennis, as may be gathered by a glance at the meagre (though complete) bibliography of the game that appears at the end of this work, and there is certainly need for more, since the game can be taught and learned by written instruction nearly as well as by personal direction. There are few capable instructors in America, too, which doubles the need for printed advice. That it requires much learning before one can expect to master it needs no proof. Eustace H. Miles, perhaps the cleverest of all amateur players of court tennis and rackets, expressed the opinion in a recent book that, "Personally, I find lawn tennis far the hardest and most scientific of all ball games that I have tried." Miles's argument is a good one, too, and bears repeating. He believes lawn tennis to be more scientific as well as more severe than similar games played indoors, because the player must always go to the ball, whereas he may wait for it to come to him in any game with side-walls and a back-wall. Lawn tennis is no child's play as the experts play it, and the physical stress of the game makes it somewhat of a tax on one's strength. Excerpt from The Game of Lawn Tennis and How to Play It The familiar recipe for making rabbit stew says that you must first catch your rabbit; likewise in playing lawn tennis you must first have your court. Courts may be three kinds - clay, dirt, and turf or grass the first being the rarest, the second the most common and the last the best. The first fundamental principle of a tennis court is that it must be level, and the second and equally as necessary that it be smooth. Scientific tennis cannot be played on the side of a hill, neither is a polo field conducive to skillful work. This consideration cannot be too forcibly impressed upon the beginner or devotee and a piece of ground that at first sight seems perfectly horizontal will upon investigation be found to vary a foot or more from the strict level. See that your court is absolutely true to start with, for if you do not you will never make it a first-class one, however much labor you spend upon its subsequent improvement. The first expense of a clay court is greater perhaps than in the case of either of the other two styles and experience has not made it a favorite with expert players. The hard surface is very trying to the feet and the high bound of the light ball does not conduce to the better grade of scientific play. The most perfect examples of these courts are to be found in those of the Far and Near Club, of Hastings on-Hudson, and that of Dr. Havens, at Nahant, Massachusetts on which the annual Nahant invitation competition is played. A brief description of the latter will serve as a good laid out typical clay court is made. The space to be occupied is first laid out and then the whole area excavated to a depth of about three feet.
