This dissertation evaluated a writing program in a middle school in the piedmont of North Carolina. The program evaluation focused on Empowering Writers, a curriculum that enables teachers to teach effective, persuasive writing skills utilizing a specific methodology. The Empowering Writers program was evaluated using Stufflebeam's Context, Input, Process and Product model (CIPP). Participants were four 6th-grade and four 7th-grade teachers who had taught the Empowering Writers curriculum for three years. Qualitative data were gathered through teacher observations and focus group interviews. Quantitative data were gathered through analysis of North Carolina's statewide 7th-grade writing end of grade test results from 2004-2007. Data were triangulated by comparison of summaries from the observations and focus group interviews, and by the analysis of the four years of test score results. Although the statewide writing test scores showed little improvement, teachers believed that student writing had improved with the implementation of the program. Teachers' biggest criticism was that the program could not be adequately implemented according to the pacing guide schedule. The guide had initially been helpful, but was a hindrance by the end of three years. Overall, the program was a positive addition to the school's literacy program. The researcher recommended that the program be continued at the site with modifications to the pacing guide, so that the pacing would incorporate the needs of all sixth and seventh grade teachers. "... a curriculum geared toward helping students gain skills in consciously regulating their actions, which in turn leads to increased control and problem solving abilities. Using a cognitive behavior approach, the curriculum's learning activities are designed to help students recognize when they are in different states called "zones," with each of four zones represented by a different color. In the activities, students also learn how to use strategies or tools to stay in a zone or move from one to another. Students explore calming techniques, cognitive strategies, and sensory supports so they will have a toolbox of methods to use to move between zones. To deepen students' understanding of how to self-regulate, the lessons set out to teach students these skills: how to read others' facial expressions and recognize a broader range of emotions, perspective about how others see and react to their behavior, insight into events that trigger their less regulated states, and when and how to use tools and problem solving skills. The curriculum's learning activities are presented in 18 lessons. To reinforce the concepts being taught, each lesson includes probing questions to discuss and instructions for one or more learning activities. Many lessons offer extension activities and ways to adapt the activity for individual student needs. The curriculum also includes worksheets, other handouts, and visuals to display and share. These can be photocopied from this book or printed from the accompanying CD."--Publisher's website.

Why you need a writing revolution in your classroom and how to lead it The Writing Revolution (TWR) provides a clear method of instruction that you can use no matter what subject or grade level you teach. The model, also known as The Hochman Method, has demonstrated, over and over, that it can turn weak writers into strong communicators by focusing on specific techniques that match their needs and by providing them with targeted feedback. Insurmountable as the challenges faced by many students may seem, The Writing Revolution can make a dramatic difference. And the method does more than improve writing skills. It also helps: Boost reading comprehension Improve organizational and study skills Enhance speaking abilities Develop analytical capabilities The Writing Revolution is as much a method of teaching content as it is a method of teaching writing. There's no separate writing block and no separate writing curriculum. Instead, teachers of all subjects adapt the TWR strategies and activities to their current curriculum and weave them into their content instruction. But perhaps what's most revolutionary about the TWR method is that it takes the mystery out of learning to write well. It breaks the writing process down into manageable chunks and then has students practice the chunks they need, repeatedly, while also learning content.
