delivering patient care as a profession. Nurses therefore have valuable insights and unique abilities to contribute as partners with other health care professionals in improving the quality and safety of care as envisioned in the Affordable Care Act (ACA) enacted this year. Nurses should be fully engaged with other health professionals and assume leadership roles in redesigning care in the United States. To ensure its members are well-prepared, the profession should institute residency training for nurses, increase the percentage of nurses who attain a bachelor's degree to 80 percent by 2020, and double the number who pursue doctorates. Furthermore, regulatory and institutional obstacles -- including limits on nurses' scope of practice -- should be removed so that the health system can reap the full benefit of nurses' training, skills, and knowledge in

Entrance Exams, 2nd Edition, National Academies Press. A recurring theme in the literature is that simulation is a positive teaching strategy when compared to other methods of instruction and produces positive student outcomes (Jefferies, 2016). Simulation provides educators a way to reproduce a clinical teaching experience in a safe, supportive learning environment.

The purpose of this quantitative research study was to determine whether an obstetrical simulation educational experience is an effective strategy for educating undergraduate nursing students in the management of a postpartum hemorrhage. A quasi-experimental study using a pre-test and post-test design was employed in a Women's Health Course and Pediatrics course over one semester. A single convenience sample (N=81) of junior baccalaureate nursing students was used for this study. There were 41 students in the control group and 40 in the experimental group. Both the control and experimental groups received the traditional didactic session, case study, skills lab instruction, and clinical. In addition, the experimental group received the postpartum simulation. This simulation study tested the differences in knowledge, satisfaction, and confidence level between junior nursing students who did and did not participate in the simulation. There were three instruments used during this study; a re-test/post-test for knowledge acquisition, the National League for Nursing (NLN) (2005) student satisfaction and confidence level survey, and the Creighton Competency Evaluation Instrument (C-CEI) (Todd, Manz, Hawkins, Parsons, & Hercinger, 2008). The pre-test/post-test measured the knowledge acquisition obtained from the didactic session. NLN (2005) student satisfaction and confidence level survey measured students' satisfaction and confidence level from either the interactive skills lab sessions or the simulation. The C-CEI tool measured the students' performance during the simulation. There were four categories: assessment, communication, clinical judgment, and patient safety that the researcher measured the students' performance during the simulation. Data for the knowledge acquisition, revealed both the experimental and control groups significantly increased between the pre-test and the post-test. The post-test showed statistically significant differences between groups, with the control group outperforming the
