Home Territories examines how traditional ideas of home, homeland and nation have been destabilised both by new patterns of migration and by new communication technologies which routinely transgress the symbolic boundaries around both the private household and the nation state. David Morley analyses the varieties of exile, diaspora, displacement, connectedness, mobility experienced by members of social groups, and relates the micro structures of the home, the family and the domestic realm, to contemporary debates about the nation, community and cultural identities. He explores issues such as the role of gender in the construction of domesticity, and the conflation of ideas of maternity and home, and engages with recent debates about the 'territorialisation of culture'.

Jordan collects various answering machine messages people leave on their phones. She claims that answering machine messages fulfill one of Bascom's folkloric functions -- education -- by intentionally or unintentionally teaching us something about the person who owns the phone. Jordan especially focuses on the prevalence of strange machine messages left by young children and college freshman. She believes that message machines are subversive insofar as they allow a person to say things that they could not say in other social situations. Jordan proposes that answering machines fulfill the folkloric element of social control by allowing the message creator to create a phone persona that reflects the way that person would like to be known.
