is significant and different than most essays because it was intended to be a radio essay on "This American Life". The author, Sarah Vowell carefully crafts her sentences in a way that makes the essay extremely conversational in a way that a radio show would be and a formal essay would not be.

What motivated Vowell to come home to watch her father shoot off his homemade cannon? Why given her aversion to guns, does she regard this cannon positively? Vowell finally wanted to understand his father and to relate to him. She thought this was perfect timing because it was the biggest gun he made.
