Basically, there are two main types of receivers - a stereo receiver and a surround receiver. Stereo receivers usually have only two channels (left and right) and are used mainly for audio devices, whereas surround receivers (also called AV receivers) can be connected to more speakers and can handle video as well. As the name suggests, surround systems let you hear sounds coming from all around you - from left, right, front and back.

If you want a home music setup, a stereo receiver is your best bet. Stereo receivers are generally more affordable than surround sound receivers. Home theater receivers, or surround sound receivers, are designed to " surround " the viewer with the audio from a TV show or movie. Surround sound receivers are generally more expensive than stereo receivers because they have to power more speakers, in some cases up to 11, and two subwoofers.
