One thing missing from most modern American men ' s lives is a “ third place. ” Sociologist Ray Oldenberg first pioneered the concept in his 1989 tome The Great Good Place, in which he explains that your third place is a hangout spot, community center or “ home away from home ” that provides an essential zone outside of home and work.

"Third L.A. with Architecture Critic Christopher Hawthorne" examines the city's architecture, urban planning, transportation and changing demographics, giving us a glimpse of Los Angeles as a model of urban reinvention for the nation and the world.

What is the Third Los Angeles? Essentially it's a shorthand, a way of describing the new civic identity that Los Angeles is working, and often struggling, to establish. It's a way of suggesting that many of the most stubborn cliches and stereotypes about L.A. and Southern California are crumbling or being held up for new scrutiny.
