Congressional Record Philip Allan

Congress occupies a central place in the U.S. political system. Its reach into American society is vast and deep. Overtime, the issues it has confronted have increased in both quantity and complexity. At the beginning, Congress dealt with a handful of matters, whereas today it has its hands in every imaginable aspect of life. It has attempted to meet these challenges and has changed throughout the course of its history, prodded by factors both external and internal to the institution. The essays in this volume argue therefore that as society changed throughout the twentieth century, Congress responded to those changes.

Excerpt from Offender Rehabilitation Act: Hearing, Ninety-Second Congress, Second Session, Relating to the Nullification of Certain Criminal Records, S. 2732 The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 10 a.m., in room 6202, New Senate Office Building. Senator Quentin N. Burdick presiding. Present: Senator Burdick. Also present: James G. Meeker, staff director, Ronald E. Meredith, minority counsel, and Judith E. Snopak, chief clerk. Senator Burdick. We are here this morning to begin formal consideration of S. 2732, legislation to quiet certain old criminal records which are barriers to the employment of rehabilitated former offenders. Although this is the first hearing we have held on this bill, these hearings are a continuation of work started by this subcommittee last year on the relationship between crime and unemployment, or underemployment. We have accumulated enough evidence to conclude that there is a real relationship and that we must begin to look for answers to some of the problems. We have learned that a disproportionate share of the people who end up in the criminal justice system had already failed in the economic system. We also know that although most former offenders who are released attempt to secure legitimate employment, it is the ones who get and keep jobs who are most likely to stay out of further trouble. This subcommittee has concerned itself with several aspects of crime and employment. In the Federal prison system, a fourth of the inmates are involved in training classes or industrial work assignments related to jobs on the outside. We have encouraged expansion of these programs. Job training is not the only answer, however, to the employment of former offenders. There are many problems. Some involve desire, some involve personal attitudes, but some of the employment problems of exoffenders are the result of the barriers we have erected that bar legitimate employment. The Federalist Papers

This authoritative edition of the complete texts of the Federalist Papers, the Articles of Confederation, the U.S. Constitution, and the Amendments to the U.S. Constitution features supporting essays in which leading scholars provide historical context and analysis. An introduction by Ian Shapiro offers an overview of the publication of the Federalist Papers and their importance. In three additional essays, John Dunn explores the composition of the Federalist Papers and the conflicting agendas of its authors; Eileen Hunt Botting explains how early advocates of women's rights, most prominently Mercy Otis Warren, Judith Sargent Murray, and Charles Brockden Brown, responded to the Federalist-Antifederalist debates; and Donald Horowitz discusses the Federalist Papers from the perspective of recent experiments with democracy and constitution-making around the world. These essays both illuminate the original texts and encourage active engagement with them.
