"As if on a conveyer belt, there will be a never ending supply of idiots and jerks that come and go in your life. Whether you stop the belt to dance with any one of them is up to you." ? Dan Pearce, Single Dad Laughing

How long does a permanent magnet remain a magnet?

Given the answers above if true, the life of a magnet would be equivalent to the sums of the half lives of the underlying material. In other words, material decay over a long period would result in no magnet. Neodymium magnets will likely lose less than 1% of their flux density over 100 years.
