Happiness, therefore, is our greatest mission. Supposing this to be our aim, Aristotle then proceeds in his Nicomachean Ethics to figure out how best to achieve this goal. Aristotle starts with the claim that happiness is dependent on virtue. He describes virtue as a disposition, rather than an activity.

Aristotle: Nicomachean Ethics Summary | GradeSaver

For Aristotle, this happiness is our highest goal. However, Aristotle does not say that we should aim at happiness, but rather that we do aim at happiness. His goal in the Ethics is not to tell us that we ought to live happy, successful lives, but to tell us what this life consists of. Most people think of happiness as physical pleasure or honor, but this is because they have an imperfect view of the good life.

The Nicomachean Ethics In his ethical treatises Aristotle offers a defense of the idea of eudaimonism (human flourishing or happiness) which is achieved as a result of human choice in search of excellence and the good life.

Written in the 4th century BC, "The Nicomachean Ethics" by Aristotle studies the pursuit of happiness and is an exploration into the characteristics of a good man. In other words, how do we live successful lives, what makes somebody a good person and why should happiness be our goal.
