McCarthy certainly raises the question of whether there is any value in going on living in his postapocalyptic world. O'Leary, for one, argues that McCarthy leaves the answer up for interpretation.

Ecological Collapse
The Road takes place in a world that has suffered a catastrophic ecological collapse. That is, the world's ecosystems have suffered a drastic shock that has caused widespread death to living organisms.

How is The Road by Cormac McCarthy like poetry? |

The novel begins with the man and boy in the woods, the boy asleep, as the two of them are making their journey along the road. The story is set in a post-apocalyptic world, date and place unnamed, though the reader can assume it's somewhere in what was the United States because the man tells the boy that they're walking the "state roads."

Set in the smoking ashes of a post-apocalyptic America, Cormac McCarthy's The Road tells the story of a father-son journey toward the sea and an uncertain salvation. The world they pass through is a ghastly vision of scorched countryside and blasted cities "held by cores of blackened looters who tunneled among the ruins and crawled from the rubble white of tooth and eye carrying charred and anonymous tins of food in nylon nets like shoppers in the commissaries of hell" [p. 181].

McCarthy is known as a reclusive writer, but when The Road was selected for Oprah's Book Club, McCarthy broke his silence and gave one television interview with Oprah Winfrey. The boy John Francis. McCarthy's son John Francis, who was born late in McCarthy's life, was the main inspiration for The Road. Supposedly much of the dialogue is taken verbatim from McCarthy's conversations with John Francis.

The isolation of the two main characters in The Road is pretty extreme. God has seemingly abandoned them, and they have totally lost contact with other decent people. For The Man, isolation compounds into something resembling alienation. His memory of a previous (and better) world makes the one he's in seem all the more desolate.
