Pateman argues that Locke's view of the social contract completely ignored the position of women with respect to the state. Pateman argues that only men have a direct relationship with the state under classical Liberal democratic regimes and that women interact with the state indirectly through the dominant male in their household. Carole Pateman's The Sexual Contract suggests that the problem is not women's "inability" to negotiate for themselves, to create "good" contracts: rather, the problem is contract itself.
