In "Tintin and the Picaros," there is an aura of modernism as Tintin and Captain Haddock have settled down. Tintin rolls into Marlinspike with his own motorcycle (as opposed to his typical borrowing in a normal fast-paced adventure). He does upside-down exercises. He and the Captain watch TV and enjoy creature comforts.

The Revolution Will Not Be Civilized: Though the Picaros are on Tintin's side, they're not portrayed as much more than drunk mercenaries. The protagonists mostly just assist Alcazar in order to save their friends, not because they particularly care about San Theodoros and the final panel of the book implies that in the end nothing has changed except the uniform of the soldiers.
