What happens when love is no longer enough? Jane Bernstein thought that learning to accept her daughter's disabilities meant her struggles were over. But as Rachel grew up and needed more than a parent's devotion, both mother and daughter were confronted with formidable obstacles. Rachel in the World, which begins in Rachel's fifth year and ends when she turns twenty-two, tells of their barriers and successes with the same honesty and humor that made Loving Rachel, Bernstein's first memoir, a classic in its field. The linked accounts in part 1 center on family issues, social services, experiences with caregivers, and Rachel herself--difficult, charming, hard to fathom, eager for her own independence. The second part of the book chronicles Bernstein's attempt to find Rachel housing at a time when over 200,000 Americans with mental retardation were on waiting lists for residential services. As Rachel prepares to leave her mother's constant protection, Bernstein invites the reader to share the frustrations and unexpected pleasures of finding a place for her daughter, first in her family, and then in the world.

My parents named me Espérance which means hope. Everyone calls me Essie, which is a strange name but it's only fair because I'm not your average college student. But I want to be. Being normal is all I've ever wanted. I want to go to college, party, have fun and study for a bright, successful future. I want to have what I have always been denied: choices. But, when I get to college I soon find out that everything has already been mapped out for me. I don't get to decide who to date, who I fall in love with or even if I can get drunk at a party like all the other students. No matter how much I want to live it up while I can, it's not in the cards for me. No, because of a stupid prophecy hanging over my head and the not-so-normal family I was born into, some people want me to die before the solar eclipse that 'll take place on my 21st birthday. And if that happens, the hope of humanity will be lost forever.
