The complete review's Review: . Women without Men describes the very different lives and fates of several women, all of which eventually intersect in a house and garden in Karaj, near Tehran. Men figure in these women's lives, but largely as an absence or a negative. Some of the male-female relationships are failed ones, but beyond that Parsipur describes a world in which there are fundamental ...

Magic is needed to escape men but men still find a way to oppress the women regardless. One of the things I did not understand was Fa ’ iza ’ s desire to marry a man who I consider the worst character in this book. Amir Khan, Munis ’ s brother, would say things like: “ women belong in the house. The outside is the world of men. ”

While Women Without Men is certain affecting and skillfully rendered, I can't help feeling that some of the nuances were lost on me, either by way of it being a translated work (no affront to the translator) or more likely, my lack of knowledge about Persian/Iranian culture. I'm certainly glad to have read it, though.
